

Christian Foust

Mr. Miller

Period 5 U.S. HISTORY

3 January, 2017

African American Importance in Our Schools

In school, multiple curriculums are taught, as they are all equally important. The Historical study is known as Social Studies and is very abroad. Living in the United States, it seems that we were one of the nations with the most African uprisings and stands against the common white man. In the establishment of this great nation, all men were proclaimed free. Except the African Americans.

As these people saw as a new nation was created, they have no rights and no reason to have fought for this nation. What was the point of saying all men are equal when they truly are not. These people fought just as hard as you and yet they get nothing. The reason we all should learn about African American history is the simple answer of the rebellion for equality. Rebellion not for selfishness but, for the true words of our declaration and promise finally ratified into action, to show that there is and always will be a reason for this great nation known as the United States of America for people of all races, culture, and religion to live.

How would you feel if you were in a nation where you fought and were given nothing. How would you feel if you were told that all men were equal and it was all just a lie. Well so many African Americans decided that it was time to ratify these words. These simple words that meant so much to the people at the time and were given to only the white people. These people showed the basic flaws in our own Declaration of Independence that not all were equal and that it should be changed so that all are equal and all are welcome as one. To them it seems that what even was the point of this revolution if they were just put on the back burner. So many iconic people like Martin Luther King Jr, Hiram R. Revels, Rosa Parks, Frederick Douglas, and more are all part of this long movement that is still in production today with not just black lives, but all lives. All lives are equal and they all should be taken into consideration the same way another person is. African Americans showed us the flaws in our own Declaration of Independence and showed rebellion for equality. It is for that very reason that African American history should be taught at our schools.